County Leads State In Per Capita Pot Sales

By Lou Marzeles

Klickitat County sold more marijuana per capita over the past year than any other county in Washington, according to a report just released by the Washington State Institute for Public Policy.

The 54-page report, entitled "I-502 Evaluation Plan and Preliminary Report on Implementation," is a comprehensive overview of the first phases of implementation of legalized marijuana in the state. It shows that sales in Klickitat County between July 2014 and June 2015 were $1,351,236, or $65.80 per capita. The county's lead over any other county was substantial, even over second-place Clark County.

Speculation is high in Oregon that the sales were less about people in Klickitat County getting stoned than easy access from users across the river. An editorial in Monday's Portland Oregonian opined, "We suppose it's possible that Klickitat County residents smoke a whole lot of pot, but it's more likely that much of it was bought by people from Cascade Locks, Hood River, The Dalles, and those passing through Goldendale on their way back to Oregon on Highway 97... Location, surely, is also responsible for the gaudy numbers posted by retailers in Clark County, where per-capita sales, at $56.93, were second only those in Klickitat County."

Oregon begins legalized sale of marijuana next month, and anticipation is that Klickitat County's sales will reflect the ready access of pot in Oregon with corresponding drops in sales. The Oregonian considered that Oregon pretty much had to go with legal pot because of the likelihood that residents would just go to Washington to make purchases that could be accommodated in Oregon.

The report released this month also reiterates concerns about conflict between state and federal law. "Many banks have been hesitant to interact with state-legal cannabis businesses because the production and sale of cannabis is a federal crime," the report stated. "The result is that financial transactions within the legal Market are conducted in cash to a large extent, though some financial institutions are beginning to work with legal cannabis businesses."

Additionally there's an issue with the IRS. "Internal Revenue Code 280E prevents state-legal cannabis businesses from deducting expenses related to sales of cannabis from their federal tax liability (though costs of goods are deductible) because cannabis is illegal under federal law," the reports notes. "For an I-502 retailer, this means that expenses such as rent and wages are not deducted from the business' annual revenues so it appears as profit in a federal return and is taxed. For many retailers this means operating at a loss."

Gilmore Smokehouse

By Mark Gibson

There are some very large fish being unloaded at Gilmore Fish Smokehouse, located at 167 Highway 197, near Dallesport. Tribal fisherman have their gill nets out for fall Chinook salmon, the catch has been good, and smokehouse manager Jim Olheiser is buying fish five days a week.

“Fresh fish is the biggest part of the business,” Olheiser said. “The smokehouse keeps us going in the off-season.”

The off-season isn't so long as it used to be, he noted. From May through October, salmon and steelhead make up the catch. There are more fish in recent years, said Olheiser, who has been buying fish for Gilmore for 20 years. Coho, sockeye, Chinook. The runs are better, with more fish available to the Native American fishermen. “20 years ago, we didn't have a spring season,” he added.

In February, sturgeon come in season, although unlike salmon sturgeon numbers have dropped over the years. “We buy maybe 20,000 pounds a year,” Olheiser said. “There are fewer every year.” Over a full year, he will buy a million pounds of fish. Most of it will be processed for the fresh fish market on site: Gilmore operates five days a week, with a crew of six or seven employees.

The Smokehouse was started by Roy Gilmore in 1985, with his wife Tommie Gilmore. His daughters, Robin Bratton and Lee “Ann” Olhieser, helped with the work and are co-owners of the smokehouse today.

Bratton was only 16 years old when she moved with her family from Longview Wash., to the Dallesport area. “We had an all girl crew our first year,” she laughed, made up of her sister and her friends and family. “It's a family business, for sure.”

During the season, Gilmore processes 30,000 pounds of fish each day. All are purchased directly from Native American fishermen working the Columbia River. Twenty years ago, Gilmore was one of only two fish buyers on the river. Today, there are 15 or 20 fish buyers working the river. The biggest impact has been on prices, said Jim Olheiser. “Prices have doubled, tripled, quadrupled. That's the biggest change. That's been good for the fishermen, of course.” “There is a lot of competition now for the fish,” he explained. “We make phone calls, we pay extra. We're lucky, because we have some very loyal fishermen that we've been working with for years.” The number of fisherman he works with varies between 20 and 40, averaging perhaps 25.

After processing, the fish are sold wholesale to buyers in Los Angeles and Portland. The fish are then retailed to stores and restaurants. “We take them to Portland, they bring them back up the river,” he laughed. Between seasons and in the winter, business turns to the smokehouse. “We sell at bazaars, as holiday gifts,” he explained.

The smoked fish are classified as “hot smoked,” but unlike most smoked fish, which is made with a combination of heat and smoke applied over an extended period of time, these fish are cold smoked in a refrigerated unit for 36 hours, then baked in an old pizza oven gleaned from an old pizza shop. The result is a juicier smoked fish. “Heat draws the moisture off,” Olheiser said.

“Since we only cook them for one and one-half hours, they lose less moisture,” he explained.

The smoked fish are then sealed in packages for sale.

Local buyers can purchase the smoked salmon at the small retail outlet under the Gilmore Fish Smokehouse sign off Highway 197, next to the fish processing facility. There are no set hours, but it truly is a family business: Park at the little smokehouse market and if Bratton doesn't come out to see what you need, her mother Tommie Gilmore will.

Council Guest Speaker

Andrew Kelly, spoke at the September 10th Council meeting. Mr. Kelly outlined the plan to make the Lyle Schools one of the highest performing schools in the state. One new program is a foreign language program with French, Spanish, and German being offered. Also there is a technical program starting up. He has a lot of enthusiasm and wants to have the community involved in the schools to help the students reach their highest potential. He pointed out how each of us has talents and experience that can be used to show students what they are capable of achieving. Some of the experience of the people in attendance included management, communications, cryptography, finance, truck mechanic, real estate, engineering and cabinet making. See the September "The Dallesport News" for more information.

You can contact Superintendent/Principal Mr. Kelly at the High School, and Assistant Principal, Sarah Russell, can be reached at Dallesport Elementary.
